

September 14, 1993

CHRONICLE

By NADINE BROZAN

How many people would want to spend an evening listening to left-handed poets read their works? More, it seems, than one might surmise.

INDIGO, a left-handed poet with one name, who organized an evening of readings at the Nuyorican Poets Cafe in May, found that it was successful enough to warrant a repeat. So tomorrow night, nine left-handed poets will read their poems at the cafe at 236 East Third Street.

"Since May about 40 poets have approached me and said, 'Did you know that I am left-handed?' " he said. "I decided there was a series in this."

Indigo, a 24-year-old Hunter College student, who said that 41 of his poems had been published in literary magazines, couldn't be more pleased. "We are celebrating something that has always been looked on as something peculiar," he said. "I've always had the feeling that left-handed people are more creative. They learn at an early age to do everything in the way that right-handed people do, so they need to show initiative. When I look at people who excel, I am never surprised to learn that they are left-handed."